Leisure activities in the UK

Unlike in many countries, young people do not take part in sport activities very much in the UK. Government statistics show that the British spend on average only 15 minutes a day doing sports. And contrary to what you might think, young people don't participate in sport more than older people. The average time spent doing sport, playing games or going swimming or hiking doesn't change much with age.

If they are not sporty, what does the average UK citizen do in his or her free time? The answer might surprise you. He or she watches TV. Statistics show that British people watch TV between two and three hours daily and men watch more than women. The other great British hobby, especially among women, is shopping. Every Saturday afternoon, you can spot her, the great British housewife, dragging a reluctant partner round the supermarkets and department stores. In the past, he would have gone to see his local football team, but wives no longer put up with that sort of thing nowadays.

People do have normal hobbies, of course. If we look at household expenditure statistics we can see that gardening and photography are still popular. In spite of TV, young people still go to the cinema, but very few people visit museums or art galleries. Magazines and newspapers are read a lot, too. But more often than not, the average British person with some free time stretches out a hand for the TV remote control.
